

A choropleth map of the United States illustrating population density. The map uses a color scale where darker shades of blue represent higher population density. The highest densities (darkest blue) are found in the Northeast corridor and around the Great Lakes. The color scale ranges from 0 to 35,000 people per square mile.